

Eating Disorders Affect Oral Health

Eating disorders can damage your oral health and physical health. More than 10 million Americans currently suffer from these disorders which include:

Anorexia: Limiting eating to the point of starvation

Bulimia: Excessive eating followed by purging

Binge eating: Excessive eating without purging

Dentists and dental hygienists are often on the front line of spotting these disorders because changes in the mouth are often the first physical signs of an eating disorder. Signs of an eating disorder may include:¹

Gum disease—gums bleed easily due to malnutrition.

Increased cavities—people use candy and sweetened drinks for energy and to stop feeling hungry.

Brittle and/or weak teeth—obvious changes occur in the color, shape and length of teeth.

Loss of dental enamel from self-induced vomiting—stomach acid eats away at tooth surfaces.

Because these conditions can be painful, people often visit dental offices for relief. That's why a dentist may be the first health professional to see what is happening.

Getting professional help for an eating disorder is very important. The earlier treatment begins, the better chance there is for recovery.

Did you know?

Up to 89 percent of bulimic patients have signs of acid-damaged teeth.

Quick bites

Changes in the mouth are often the first physical signs of an eating disorder. Some symptoms include:²

- Fruity or an unusual smell to breath
- Chronic dry mouth
- Cracked, red and dry lips
- Enlarged salivary glands
- Mouth sores
- Highly sensitive teeth
